Abstract

Artisanal and small-scale gold mining (ASGM) has a number of environmental and health effects, ranging from mercury pollution over respiratory diseases to asphyxia. Yet despite these risks, hundreds of thousands of people continue working and living in the mines, as they (in) directly depend on them for their livelihoods. What remains little understood, is whether the persistence of harmful mining practices is mostly a matter of limited information, of limited resources (financial, material), of prioritization (trade-off between short-term economic gain and long-term gains), of structurally unequal power relations, of bad governance or misguided government policies, or due to something else. As long as this is insufficiently understood, all proposed solutions risk to either not be adapted to the context, or not be accepted by local populations. Together with a CEGEMI team, we set up a participatory action research in one selected mine, Kamituga, aiming to document health and environmental effects, study their causes and possible solutions, and develop sensitization material that can be used by the miners to adopt better practices.
